

屋檐与天空相接之处，即是故事的开端。 一本记录屋脊、 气候与庇护之形的行走笔记。

檐行记

檐行记

The Eaves of Heaven

檐行记

行至檐下出版

由屋顶与风的旅程计划出品

印于二〇二五年冬季

设计与排版：朱贝贝

字体：Palatino / 汉字之美仿宋GBK

印刷支持：Pratt Press, Brooklyn, NY

The Eaves of Heaven

Published by Under the Eaves Press

A project by The Journey of Roof and Wind

Printed in Winter 2025

Design and layout by Anna Zhu

Typefaces: Palatino / Hanzi Zhimei FangSong GBK

Printed with the support of Pratt Press, Brooklyn, NY

献给曾与我一同仰望屋檐的人。

你说风从南方来，我便在那方向写下所有的旅程。

每一次抬头看见天光的时候，都想起那日你站在屋角的身影。

愿这本书，带着那一刻的光，

抵达你曾经停留的地方。

Preface Departure

Start 9

Path of Words 11

Part I Travel Volume

The South 17

Towards the North 29

Dun Huang 41

Lhasa 59

Beneath the Eaves 78

Part II Craft Volume

Makers of Heaven 86

序 出发

一、缘起 ..... 九

二、行文 ..... 十一

行 旅卷

三、南方 ..... 十七

四、向北 ..... 二九

五、敦煌 ..... 四一

六、拉萨 ..... 五九

七、屋檐之下 ..... 七八

造 共卷

八、造屋 ..... 八六

屋檐让我学会如何看见 看见光的方向 也看时间在风里的形状
在那道阴影下　世界有了边界 也有了温度

序　出发

缘起

二〇二〇年，我离开了长久封闭的城市，沿着屋檐的方向出发。那时时间似乎被按下了暂停，人们的脚步都变得很轻，街上的风也没有方向。

我开始想，建筑与人的关系，也许并不只是使用与被使用的结构，而是一种延续——像呼吸那样的存在。屋顶就是这种延续的形状。它在时间里缓慢地老去，又在季节的循环中被不断修补。那些瓦片、梁木、灰尘与光线共同组成了人与世界之间的一种边界，也是一种接触。于是我决定出发，去看这些不同的屋檐，看它们在空气里留下的线条与痕迹。

南方的瓦是湿的，带着苔藓的颜色；中部的砖是温的，透着人手的痕迹；北方的石是冷的，在光下呈现出一种近乎静止的质感。每一处屋檐下，都有声音、气味与某种不被说出的情感。写下它们，是为了记得，也为了在变化的时间里重新定义“庇护”。

In the year 2020, I left the city that had stayed quiet under lockdown for too long and set out in the direction of rooftops. Time felt paused then; footsteps were light, and the wind on the streets moved without purpose.

I began to think that the link between people and buildings might be more than use and structure—perhaps a kind of continuity, something that breathed. A roof held that continuity: aging slowly, repaired with every season, letting tiles, beams, dust, and light become both a boundary and a point of contact. So I left, hoping to see how different rooftops marked the air with their lines and traces.

In the south, the tiles were damp with moss; inland, the bricks were warm with the trace of hands; in the north, the stone was cold and sharpened by light. Under every eave lived sounds, scents, and quiet feelings. Writing them down became a way to remember—and to ask again what “shelter” means.

一路往外走的时候，我其实并没有什么宏大的计划，只是想离开那种空气都不流动的日子。第一站住在南方一个很小的镇上，屋顶都是深色的瓦，雨下来的时候会有一股潮湿的木味。我每天都在巷子里乱走，看当地人怎么修屋檐、怎么晾衣服、怎么在屋角堆柴。很多屋顶并不好看，甚至有些歪斜，但正是这些不完美让我觉得建筑是“活”的。

后来往北的路上，我在火车上睡着又醒，看到窗外的瓦变成砖，砖变成更冷的石头。我开始注意到自己看屋顶的方式变了——不再只是欣赏形状，而是想象住在下面的人，他们一天的生活，他们为什么要这样建。

我发现自己在记录的不是建筑，而是那些比建筑更轻的东西：气味、温度、步伐、声音，甚至是不说出来的疲惫。也就是在那时候，我意识到这趟旅程其实是在逼我面对自己——我到底在逃离什么，又在寻找什么。

When I left home, I had no plan—only the need to escape days where even the air felt still. I stayed first in a small southern town, where dark tiles soaked up the rain and released a faint wooden scent. I wandered the alleys watching people repair their eaves, hang laundry, and stack firewood. Many rooftops were crooked or worn, yet their flaws made them feel alive.

Further north, I slept and woke on trains, seeing the tiles outside my window turn into brick, and the brick into colder stone. I realized my way of looking at rooftops had shifted—not simply admiring their shapes, but imagining the people beneath them: the rhythm of their days, the reasons they built the way they did.

I realized I was recording not architecture, but the lighter things around it: the smell of rain, the heat of a wall, footsteps in an empty street, and the quiet fatigue people never speak of. Somewhere along the way, I understood that this journey was really leading me back to myself—toward what I was escaping, and what I hoped to find.

行文

写东西这件事，在路上比在家里更难，也更容易。难，是因为每天都在走，一到晚上只想倒在床上，不想和任何词语打交道；容易，是因为旅途中有太多东西会突然跳出来，硬是逼你记下来。刚出发时我还带着一本笔记本，结果第一周就被雨淋得像一块湿面巾纸，字全糊成一片。后来我索性随手写在车票背面、旅馆房卡的纸套、甚至是买早餐的小纸袋上——只要能写就行。

有一次在车站等车，我写着写着，被旁边卖茶叶蛋的大妈看得不好意思，她还以为我在给她写投诉信。还有一次在北方的小旅店，写到半夜突然停电，我摸着空气找手机，结果翻倒一堆不知道是谁留下的旧明信片，那一刻我突然觉得写作这件事真的比我想象的大胆：它把我放在一个陌生的房间里，让我面对连自己都还没想清楚的事。

在屋檐下写字，比在室内更安静。我喜欢把后背靠在墙上，让风从瓦缝里吹下来，把我本来想写的句子全部吹乱。很多内容不是我规划好的，而是从环境里冒出来的——光照在瓦片上的颜色、远处传来的施地声、一个完全不认识的人跟我闲聊“这屋顶是前年修的”。这些零碎的声音，比旅记还旅记。

所以“行文”对我来说并不是整理，而是跟着当下走。有些句子是在车上抖出来的，有些是在寒风里握着冻僵的手写的，有些是醒来后发现枕边的纸条竟然是昨晚自己半睡半醒写下的。写不写得好我不知道，但这些文字至少忠实地记录了我当时的样子——有点累，有点迷糊，却很认真地在看一座又一座屋檐。

Writing on the road is both harder and easier than writing at home. Harder, because after walking all day I often just want to fall into bed and forget the pen entirely. Easier, because too many things demand to be written down. My notebook survived only a week before a rainstorm reduced it to a soft lump, so I began writing on whatever I could find—train tickets, hotel key card sleeves, even the paper bag from my breakfast. Anything that held ink was enough.

Once, while waiting for a bus, I was jotting notes and the woman selling boiled eggs kept staring; she later asked if I was writing a complaint about her stall. Another night in a small northern guesthouse, the power went out mid-sentence, and I knocked over a pile of old postcards in the dark. In that dim moment, I realized writing was braver than I thought—it kept placing me in unfamiliar rooms and asking me to face things I hadn't yet sorted out.

Writing under an eave is quieter than writing indoors. I like leaning against a wall and letting the wind slip through the tiles, rearranging all the sentences I thought I had planned. Most things weren't chosen by me—they came from the surroundings: the color of light on a tile, the sound of someone sweeping far away, or a stranger casually telling me, "This roof was repaired two years ago." These tiny moments feel more like travel notes than anything I could consciously make.

So "writing," for me, isn't really about organizing. It's about moving with whatever happens. Some lines were shaken out of me on a train; some were written with numb fingers in a cold wind; some were discovered the next morning on a piece of paper I barely remembered writing. I don't know if any of it is good, but it is honest—it shows exactly who I was then: a little tired, a little confused, but looking very seriously at one roof after another.

可能会是晴天，也可能是风大到睁不开眼。 会经过水洗很重的地方， 也会是到空气干得像纸的地方。

我记录下了我看到的，我听到的，我所感受到的，所闻到的。这一切组成了我的一生——在屋檐下被庇护的一生。

I recorded what I saw, what I heard, what I felt and what I smelled. All of this made up my life — a life protected under the eaves.

2020.3.14 春季 · 南方

Spring, The South

二〇二〇年的春天，我第一次真正意义上地离开那座熟到麻木的城市。按理说我也来自南方，可那座城市一点南方的味道都没有——没有湿风、没有潮气，也没有让人慢下来的理由。我一直以为自己对“南方”了如指掌，直到那段时间空气里总有一种说不出的闷，我每天都觉得自己被生活按在原地，像鲁迅笔下那些“惯于低头的人”——但我不想再低头了。我需要出去，用自己的脚确认世界还在转，于是我往更南的地方走。那是一个我从未真正认识过的南方。没有计划，只带了一点钱和一本被压坏了角的旧手账。

In the spring of 2020, I left the city I had grown numb to. I come from the south in name, yet my hometown had never carried the softness of the south—no humid wind, no slow warmth, none of the looseness people imagine. That season the air felt sealed, and I felt sealed with it. I no longer wished to move through life with the lowered posture Lu Xun once wrote of. I wanted to know if the world was still turning, and if I could still turn with it. So I went further south, without plans, carrying only a little money and a notebook with a bent corner.

南方的第一口风吹在脸上时，我竟有点想笑。那风带着湿气，也带着一点旧日子的味道，让我突然意识到自己真的离开了原来的生活。火车靠站时，窗外全是低矮的瓦房，瓦面黑得发亮，像刚被雨洗过。下车的那一刻，我闻到土腥味、河水味，还有巷子里刚煮好的早饭味道——这一切都让我觉得世界重新活了起来，而我也终于有机会跟着它一起动一动。

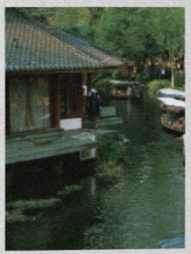

我在一个靠水的小镇落脚。那里什么都不紧不慢，连影子都是湿的。清晨屋檐常常滴水，声音一下一下落在石板上，像在提醒我：“这里的日子是可以慢的。”我走在小巷里看人修瓦、补墙、晾衣服，每一个动作都安安静静，却比任何风景都更像生活。我忽然明白，第一次出走的意义不是去看远方，而是重新认识自己原来还能看见什么。

那时我还不知道将来会去哪，也不知道这趟路会把我带到西藏。从南方出发，只是因为那里最软、最湿、最容易让人把心放下来——而我当时需要的，也只是一个能让我先呼一口气的地方。

The first southern wind touched my face and loosened something in me. It carried the smell of old days and water, and for the first time in a long while I felt myself stepping out of stillness. When the train slowed, the window filled with low, dark roofs, the tiles shining as if freshly washed by rain. Stepping onto the platform, I breathed in wet earth, river water, and someone's breakfast drifting from a nearby alley. It felt like the world exhaled—and I finally remembered how to breathe.

I stayed in a small town by the water, where nothing hurried and even shadows moved slowly. Each morning, droplets fell from the eaves and tapped on the stone in a rhythm that eased the heart. I wandered the alleys watching people mend tiles, patch walls, and hang their clothes in the sun. Their quiet gestures felt like a kind of landscape. And I began to see that a first departure is less about distance than about learning your eyes can open again.

I didn't know where the road would lead—not that it would take me to Tibet a year later. All I knew then was that the south was soft enough, and damp enough, to let something inside me loosen. And in that moment, all I needed was a place where breath could return.

2020.3.27 我在南方的小镇

When the South Wind Arrives

— Shen Chi

Spring arrives in Jiangnan like a whisper of mist settling over the rooftops—soft enough to blur the edges of the world.

The dark tiles breathe in the early light, holding a warmth so faint
it feels like the season brushing its fingertips across them.

Swallows slip past the eaves, half-finished verses written in the air—the sky completing what their wings begin.

Even the rain is gentle here:
lingering in the grooves of the roof,
waiting a heartbeat before falling—a patience older than memory.

Under the eaves,
the air turns slow and luminous, and Jiangnan becomes less a place than a feeling held loosely in the mist—warm enough to vanish, beautiful enough to ache.

南风初来

《沈迟》

江南的春天来得悄 像一层薄雾 在瓦面上轻轻坐下
屋顶沿着垄子呼吸 青瓦湿得发亮 像被春光轻抚过的脉络

燕子擦着檐飞 尾翼划过空气 像写下一句未完的诗
雨从不急 它在瓦沟里绕一圈再落下 每一滴都像带着前世的温柔

我站在屋檐下 看春光把世界泡得更软 更慢 更像梦

江南在这一刻 不是一方水土 而是一种被雾轻轻接住的感觉 温暖到几乎要消失 美得只剩下呼吸的声响

路过寺庙时，我在庭院里停了一会儿，雨从黑瓦的屋檐一串串落下，打在被岁月磨得发亮的石板上，声音细细密密的，像是把整座庙的安静一点点敲开，让人忍不住也跟着呼吸慢下来。

Passing the temple, I paused in the courtyard as rain slipped from the dark eaves onto the worn stone slabs, each small sound quietly opening the calm of the place and slowing my breath.

我每天都在巷子里乱走，看当地人怎么修屋檐、怎么晾衣服、怎么在屋角堆柴。很多屋顶并不好看，甚至有些歪斜，但正是这些不完美让我觉得建筑是“活”的。

Many of the roofs weren't beautiful at all—some crooked, some patched in a hurry—but that imperfection made them feel alive. As I continued north, sleeping on trains and waking to windows full of changing landscapes, the roofs turned from tile to brick, and brick to colder stone.

遇到下雨的日子，屋檐就更像在呼吸。 雨水从瓦片边缘一串串落下， 把这些普通的小房子照得亮一点、 也暖一点。 那一刻我才发现， 江南的风景不是美在整齐， 而是美在这些被雨滴轻轻点亮的瞬间。

On rainy days, the eaves seemed to breathe.
Water fell in quiet strings,
softening the small houses.
And I realized the south wasn't beautiful for its order, but for the moments the rain briefly lit up.

2020.5.5 夏季 · 向北

Summer, Towards the North

从南方离开时，空气里还带着一点潮意。可风一吹进内陆，那层湿就被晒得很快——热不再糊着皮肤，而是像从石头里直接散出来，让人分不清是被晒着还是被风吹着。北方城市的屋顶在这样的季节里显得格外沉稳：深灰的瓦在阳光下泛着浅亮，石头的檐角被时间磨得锋利，却安静得像不需要证明什么。

我到达那座古城时正是盛夏。大街宽得可以容下三条风，尘土被卷得像轻烟，落在瓦脊、木窗和行人肩头。屋顶下的影子虽少，却比南方凉，那凉意不是庇护，而是一种距离——提醒你，这里的建筑从来不是为了讨好，而是为了站住。黄昏时分，屋脊在落日里泛红，像被照亮的旧骨。我看着石墙的影子在地面上慢慢伸长，那一刻我才明白北方的屋顶为何让人沉静：它们不靠湿度，不靠颜色，而是靠结构里渗出的那份坚定。

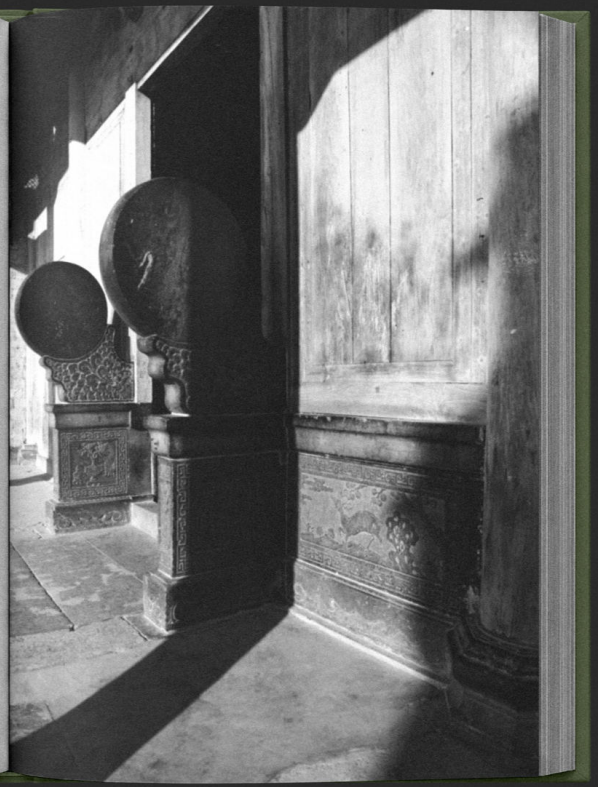

Leaving the south, the last trace of humidity vanished as the wind moved inland. Heat rose straight from stone, a dry sharpness that blurred the line between sun and wind. In the northern city, the rooftops felt steadier—dark tiles catching a thin shine, stone eaves honed by time, standing with a quiet firmness.

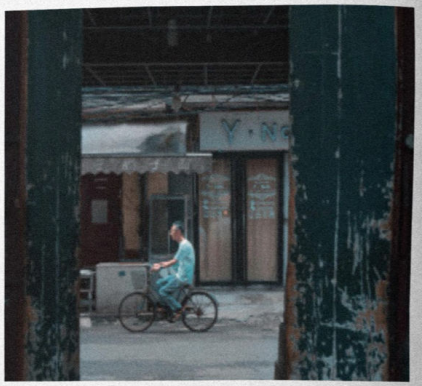

I arrived at the old city in the height of summer, where wide streets carried long threads of wind and lifted dust onto ridges and windows. The shadows beneath the roofs were few but cool, offering not comfort but distance. By dusk, the ridge lines glowed like old bones in the sun, and I understood that northern roofs feel still not because of color or moisture, but because strength is written into their very structure.

My room was on the top floor of an old building. Only a thin wooden ceiling separated me from the roof, which burned hot enough to glow. Sometimes I leaned over the balcony and watched the ridges of nearby buildings fade into a pale haze, polished slowly by the weight of summer.

我住在一栋老房子的顶层。楼顶离我只隔一块薄木板，大阳一照就烫得不敢碰。我常常趴在阳台栏杆上，看对面屋脊在热光里慢慢褪色，被夏天磨得越来越亮。

奇怪的是，夜晚却意外安静，只剩下远处的火车声在空里伸展。那声音让我明白，不管白天多吵闹，每一座屋顶在夜里都会沉下来，像是在长长地吐一口气。

在小巷里，偶然看见一位老人从门洞下走过。

W Z，

一步一步慢得很稳。

风从巷口吹进来，把他外套的后摆吹起一点，

但他没有被催促的意思。

等他走过去后，门洞里的那点光也安静下来。

午后的热风把巷子吹得像一个烤箱。我躲在一处老屋檐下乘凉，砖墙晒得发烫，瓦缝里有碎光掉下来。一个卖冷饮的老人推着小车经过，停在我面前，看了看天，又看了看我。

“热得受不了吧？”

我点头。

他把毛巾甩了甩，笑得很慢：

“这地方就是这样，屋顶都被晒得要说话了。”

我抬头看那屋檐，热气在瓦上晃着，像一层轻烟。

“你不觉得累吗？天天在这种天里走。”

老人耸耸肩：

“累啊。”

又补了一句，声音轻得像是落在瓦片上：

“不过有风、有屋檐，人就还能撑。”

他说完推着车继续往前走，影子被太阳拉得很长。我忽然觉得，在这座火热的城市里，屋檐比凉水更能让人暂时安下心来。

The afternoon heat filled the alley like a slow-burning furnace. I stepped beneath an old eave, letting the shade settle over my shoulders. The bricks behind me were warm to the touch, and light filtered through the gaps in the tiles, trembling as if the roof itself were breathing in the heat.

People hurried past, their footsteps sharp against the stone, the whole street humming with summer. An old man pushing a cart paused beside me.

“Too hot to walk, isn’t it?” he said.

I nodded.

He glanced up at the roof, then back at me.

“When the eaves feel this warm, that’s when you know summer won’t let go.”

“Don’t you get tired?” I asked.

He gave a small, amused sigh.

“Tired, sure. But a bit of shade keeps people alive.”

He moved on, his shadow stretching long across the bright street, unspooling behind him as if the heat itself were pulling it farther and farther down the road.

在古城的日子里，我常常得空气里有一种把人往内心推的力量。
或许正因为这样，我想起三毛那句小时候听不懂的话：

“平凡简单，安于平凡，真不简单。”

当时觉得大大人，现在却突然觉得，她说的可能正是这种从建筑里传出来的安静。城里的宗教建筑彼此并排而立，却各守其道。礼拜殿的中轴线笔直，用绿琉璃瓦覆起“一真殿式”屋顶，像用形制表达信仰的秩序；道观的重檐歇山顶层层托起，斗拱密得像指节，稳得让风也绕路；砖塔被岁月磨出圆润的线条，一块块叠上去，像时间亲手建的结构。

这些屋顶都不华丽，却都有一种稳。
檐口伸得宽，是为了给雨留出口；
梁架做得重，是为了替人挡风；
瓦色深沉，是为了让光照上去时显得更柔。

看久了才明白，建筑真正保护人的，从来不是装饰，而是这种不动声色的结构。
坐在屋檐下的那天下午，我忽然理解那句“安于平凡”——
不是不追求，而是不被风吹得乱。
屋顶能站住的地方，人心大概也能慢慢站住。

In that old city, something in the air kept slowing me down, as if the place wanted me to listen rather than hurry. Maybe that's why a line from Sanmao came back to me—one I never understood as a child:

“To live simply, and be at peace with the simple, is not simple at all.”

It suddenly made sense in a way it never had before. The religious roofs here stood quietly beside one another, each carrying its own logic.

The prayer hall lifted a straight central axis under a green-glazed roof, its symmetry echoing a belief in oneness. The Daoist hall rose in layered hip-and-gable eaves, held up by dense dougong that locked together like knuckles. And farther in, the brick tower showed its age in softened edges, each course of bricks stacked the way time builds its own structure.

None of these rooftops tried to impress.
Their wide eaves were made to give rain a path; their heavy beams were meant to hold the wind; their muted tiles existed so the light could fall gently. I realized protection comes not from ornament, but from the quiet way a roof chooses to stand.

That afternoon beneath the eaves, I finally understood
Sanmao's line. Peace is not absence—
It is steadiness. And anything that can stand through wind, perhaps the heart can learn to stand with it.

离开那座古城的那天，我才发现，旅程里真正会留下来的，并不是城墙的厚度，也不是太阳把瓦面照得发亮的颜色。而是那些在屋檐底下停住的一瞬——明明只是盛夏的阴影，却像给人撑住了一点什么。

也是走得久了才明白，屋檐之所以让人安心，不是因为它能挡多少风日，而是因为它在烈日下依旧稳稳地在那里，像一条不会移动的线，提醒你——无论世界多远、多热、多喧嚷，总有一个地方可以让你暂时不必赶路。

When I left that old city, I realized that what stays from a journey isn't the height of the walls or the way the sun turns the tiles bright, but the brief moments spent under an eave—a thin line of midsummer shade that somehow steadies you.

A roof comforts not by blocking the heat, but by holding still in it, reminding you that no matter how bright or loud the world becomes, there is always a place where you don't have to rush.

雁塔晨鐘

2020.9.19 西北 · 敦煌

Northwest, Dun Huang

往西走得越远，世界就越干净。秋天在这里不是凉的，而是明亮的：阳光不像热，而像一整面金色的墙，把空气照得发白。风带着沙子在屋顶上掠过，把瓦面磨得光光的，像是长年累月被光抚过的石头。白天行走在街巷之间，会觉得影子被太阳压得很薄，薄到只剩下一条勉强贴着地面的线；而等夜色落下来，温度又迅速降下去，屋檐被冷风紧住，像是突然收回了白天的锋芒，把整座城放进另一种更深的静里。

我在这里意识到，旅程正在往“上”走——不是山势的上升，而是心境被光和空气慢慢推高。西北的天空比任何地方都宽，光也比任何地方都硬，每一座屋顶都像在替这片土地承担风沙与日照的重量。站在这些被时间吹得发亮的檐下，我忽然明白，越向西走，越靠近的是一种古老而无声的高度，一种像神明一样不急、不言，却始终在上方注视着你的力量。

The farther west I went, the sharper the world became. Autumn here was bright rather than cool, the sun cutting the air into hard white light.Wind carried sand across the rooftops, polishing the tiles until they shone like old stone. By night the heat fell away, and the eaves gathered the cold, holding the city in a deeper quiet.

Somewhere in this dry brightness, I realized the journey was beginning to rise—not in altitude, but in spirit. Under these wide skies and weathered roofs, it felt as if each step moved a little closer to something higher, something that watched in silence from above.

白天在城里乱走的时候，我总觉得自己的影子被晒得轻了一点。敦煌的光没有耐心，照在土墙上会把颜色晒得发白，照在沙子上又常得像要溢出来。风里混着细沙，掠过屋檐时会带起一阵细碎的声响，瓦面上的沙粒被吹得轻轻滚动，像是在为这片土地保存什么微弱的记忆。檐下的阴影虽薄，却恰好能让人停一会儿，像是给这块干燥的空气留了一点温柔的余地。

我沿着街巷慢慢走，脚下的尘土被踩得松松的，走到哪里都能听见自己鞋底和地面的摩擦声。那些靠在街角的老房子，木梁干得像骨头，檐口压得很低，光从瓦缝间落下来时，会把梁上的纹理照得愈发清楚。它们不是装饰，而是被风和时间累积出来的线条。我喜欢在这种屋檐下站一会儿，不为避阳，只是觉得在这里呼吸会比较稳，连心里的声音都安静一点。

During the day, wandering through the city, I kept feeling my shadow grow lighter. Dunhuang's light has no patience—it bleaches the walls and spills across the sand, leaving nothing to hide behind. The wind carries fine grains that skim along the eaves, making the sand on the tiles stir as if the rooftops were keeping a small memory of their own. The shade beneath them is thin, almost fragile, yet just enough to pause in, a brief softness offered by the dry air. for whoever passed by.

I wandered through the narrow streets without thinking. Dust shifted under my shoes, and the old houses leaned quietly at the corners. Their bone-dry beams and low eaves held shadows shaped by wind and time, not design. I liked standing beneath them—not to hide from the sun, but because the air there felt steadier, as if even my thoughts slowed down.

有时走到巷子尽头，会突然觉得这座城比看上去更大。光线在土墙上反来覆去，风裹过屋角时会带一点沙子的声音，像在告诉你前面还有路，还有空地，还有不知道的亮处。

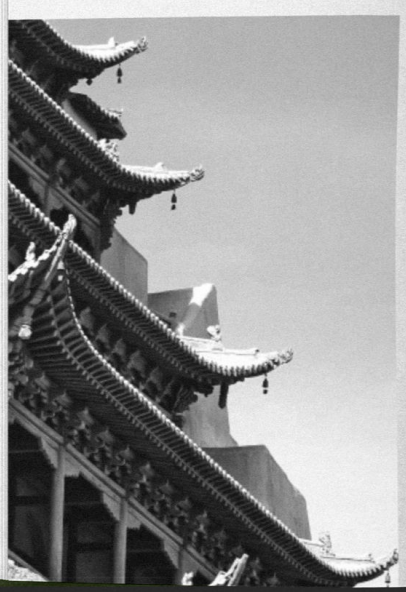

Sometimes at the end of a narrow alley, the city felt larger than it looked. Light kept shifting along the adobe walls, and the wind, turning around a corner, carried a faint rustle of sand—as if telling me there was still more ahead, more open space, more brightness I hadn't reached yet.

再往外走，土墙渐渐稀了，风却开始大起来。沙丘的线条在阳光下变得锋利，远处的地平线像被什么力量拉得更高。偶尔有风把沙吹成低低的雾，它们在地面漂着，又很快散开。西北的风没有方向，但会让人莫名其妙地想继续向前，仿佛下一步会进入另一个更亮的世界。

走得越开阔，内心反而越轻。不是豁然开朗的那种轻，而是一种被光推着往上走的轻。脚下是沙，头顶是硬得几乎透明的天空，中间的一切都被风吹得干干净净。这里没有谁告诉我该往哪里去，但空气里总有一种温和的力度，把我往高处托了一点，让人不得不抬头。

Farther out, the walls thinned and the wind grew stronger. The ridges of the dunes turned sharper in the sunlight, and the horizon in the distance rose higher, stretched by a force I couldn't name. Sometimes the wind lifted a low veil of sand that drifted across the ground before disappearing again. There is no clear direction to the wind here, yet it gives you the quiet urge to keep walking, as if the next step might open into a brighter place.

The more open it became, the lighter I felt—not in a dramatic way, but in the slow, lifted way that comes from being pushed upward by light itself. Sand beneath my feet, a sky so clear it seemed almost hollow above me, and the wind cleaning the space between the two. No one told me where to go, but the air carried a gentle pressure that nudged me upward, just enough to make me raise my head.

在莫高窟外的沙漠里，我突然觉得自己很小。风带着沙子滑过去，建筑静静地晒着太阳。天空离我近得有点不真实，抬头就像能摸到。那一刻，什么都不用想。

Standing in the desert outside the Mogao Caves, I suddenly felt small. The wind skimmed past with sand, and the buildings rested quietly in the sun. The sky felt almost too close, as if I could touch it just by looking up. For a moment, nothing needed thinking.

在这些干燥、明亮、几乎没有重量的时刻里，我觉得自己和这片土地之间的距离忽然变得很短。像是再往前走几步，就能听见某种看不见的东西在呼吸。

In these dry, bright moments that feel almost weightless, I found the distance between myself and this land shrinking. As if a few more steps forward, and I might hear something unseen exhale.

从城里往更静的方向走去，风带的沙子渐渐少了，取而代之的是洞窟口里沉下来的凉意。和外面的烈光相比，洞窟里的温度像是被时间保存过——干燥却柔和。我站在一座早期中心塔柱窟前，抬头能看到人字披顶在阴影里缓缓展开，木质斗拱紧贴着岩体，像一只托着整个山壁的手。这样的结构最初是为了让人绕塔而行，可走近时却更像是一条被光悄悄往上引的路。

Farther from the streets, the wind thinned and a cooler stillness gathered at the cave entrances. Inside the early tower-pillar caves, the air felt held in place—dry, quiet, almost deliberate. The pitched roofs rested on wooden dougong that clung to the rock like a steady hand. They were built for the ritual of circling the tower, yet standing beneath them, I felt as if the space itself was guiding my eyes upward.

壁画的颜色比我想象的安静。不是鲜艳，是一种被时间压得很轻的亮。

刚好遇到几个僧人一起走进香后。他们的步子很轻，
轻到像是沙子都不愿意被打扰。

在另一处洞窟里，覆斗顶向上收拢，四面微微倾斜，天光从缝隙里落进来，把藻井照得像是在空中的天外之天。那种“上方”的空间感几乎是温柔的，它不会逼你抬头，却会让你的目光忍不住慢慢向上滑。藻井一层一层叠起，每一层都像是某种古老信念的呼吸，轻轻托着洞里那些千年的颜色。

In another cave, the inverted-dome ceiling drew inward layer by layer, and the light slipped down its slopes like a soft command. The coffered center rose toward a sky you couldn't see, but could somehow sense. Each tier felt like a breath the past had left behind, supporting the colors that had endured for a thousand years.

向上之地

〈程一帧〉

秋天在这里明得刺眼 光落在沙上 也落在屋顶的边缘 风从远处跑来 把尘土推上瓦背 像在替这片土地写信

每一粒沙都知道时间的方向 而屋顶只负责站得足够稳 午后的光像刀 却照不痛屋檐 它们在干燥的空气里呼吸得很慢 影子薄得几乎透明

塔尖突然亮了一下 像时间抖落的一粒光
你和我藏在干燥的空气里 也藏在望着向上的弧度里

风的方向变高 变轻 屋檐沉下来 我走在它们下面 像是被推向某个更高的静处

The Land That Rises

— Cheng Yizhen

Autumn here sharpens the light. It falls on sand, then edges the rooftops. Wind runs in from far away, pushing dust up the tiles, as if writing messages into this strip of land. Every grain of sand knows the direction of time; the roof simply stands— steady enough for all of it. Afternoon light cuts like a blade but never hurts the eaves; they breathe slowly in the dry air, their shadows almost transparent. A tower tip flashes— a brief spark from time's long sleeve. Faith hides in the parched air; it also hides in the upward curve of the ridge. The wind begins to climb. The direction tilts higher. Night drops its weight, and the eaves sink down, as if thinking. And I— beneath these roofs— feel myself lifted, as though being pushed toward a quieter and higher place.

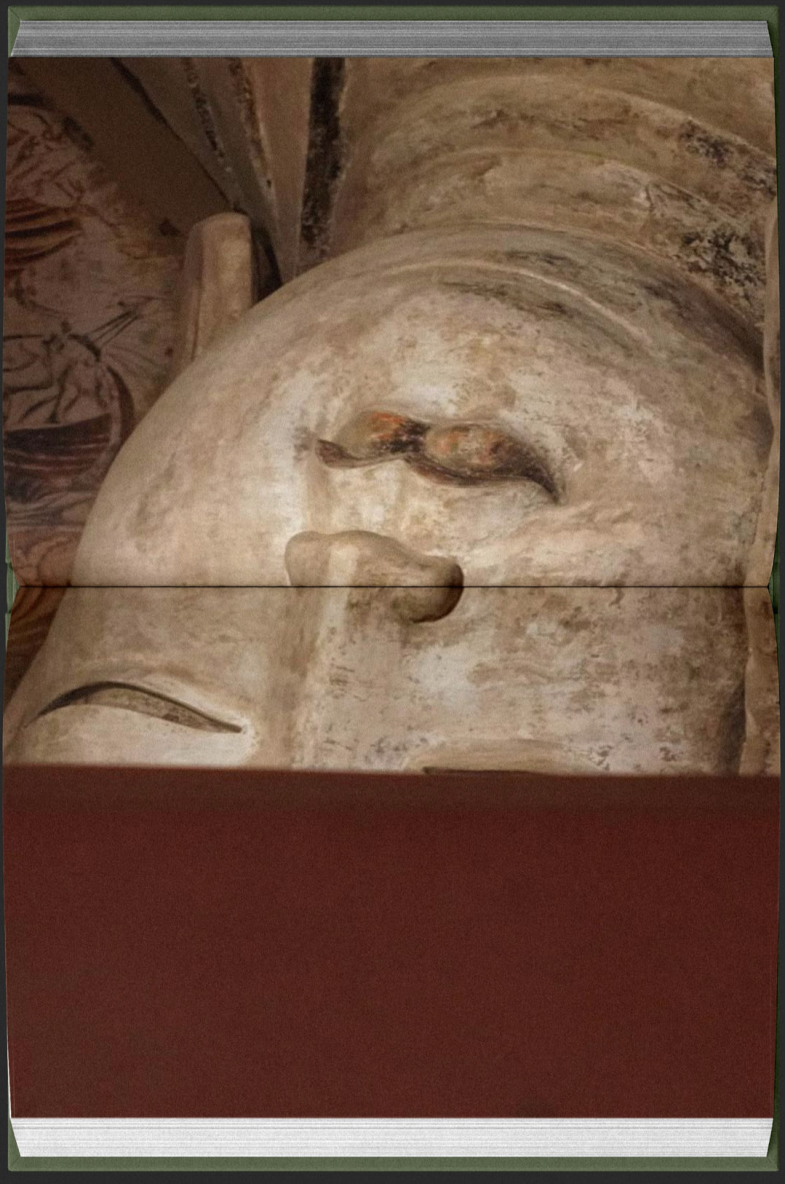

走到北区时，光线再次变硬。那里原本是僧侣生活的地方，土炕、灶坑和旧木梁安静地留在角落里。没有华丽的壁画，也没有游客停留，只有最普通的屋顶结构在头顶撑着，像是为了让一日三餐与修行呼吸在同一个高度。那些梁柱因为干燥而发白，像白骨一样，却也正因此显得坦然。

The northern caves felt plainer, almost domestic. Kang beds, hearths, pale beams—nothing ornate, just roofs made to hold meals, chants, and long stretches of quiet. The wood had faded to a bone-white simplicity, purpose stripped bare.

越走越能感到一种不言而喻的高度：
不是殿堂的高度，也不是山的高度，
而是这些“向上”的结构在空气里汇聚成的那一点点光。
我站在洞窟外眺望戈壁时，觉得脚下的土地是平的，但心里的路却在悄悄往上倾。

Somewhere among these rising roofs and carved ceilings, the air grew quietly higher.
The land stayed flat, yet something inside tilted upward, as if the architecture lifted the spirit before the mountains appeared.

2021.1.19 西藏 · 拉萨

Tibet, Lhasa

二〇二一年的冬天，我踏上了前往西藏的路。那一年城市的天空总是灰的，我想去一个能看见屋顶尽头的地方。列车从夜里开出，窗外是连绵的山和低得几乎要碰到屋檐的云。风在车厢的缝里呼啸，带着铁和雪的气味。到了拉萨，空气变得轻，脚步也变得慢。白墙、红瓦、经幡、光——它们在寒冷里并不耀眼，却让人觉得一切都被时间温柔地托着。那时我还不明白，自己寻找的并不是一座寺庙，也不是答案，而是一种可以抬头的平静。

In the winter of 2021, I set out for Tibet. The city had been gray for months, and I wanted to see where the roofs met the clouds. The train moved through the dark, carrying the smell of iron and snow. The wind breathed through the cracks of the train, carrying the scent of metal and snow. In Lhasa, the air grew lighter and my steps slowed. White walls, red roofs, prayer flags, and light—none of them bright, yet all gently held by time. I didn't know then that I wasn't looking for a temple or an answer, but a calm that allowed me to lift my head.

山里的牦牛走得很慢。雪地上留下的影子比它们本身
还稳，好像它们天生就知道怎么和风和平相处。

远远看见牦牛数月在山坡上，像撒 在白纸上的墨点。

在西藏，风是一种恒久的存在。它不是经过，而是驻留在空气里的东西。

早晨的屋檐沾着夜里的寒气，光线还未完全落下，僧人已经在院子里扫地。瓦片的边缘积着一层细灰，阳光一照便飞起。这里的屋顶并不高，却似乎能延伸到云的底下。白色的墙在光里闪出微弱的黄，木梁和铁钉在风中轻轻作响。行走在这些屋檐之间，会觉得自己像被时间掠过的人。

风从远处的山口穿来，带着积雪的味道；它经过屋角时改变方向，像在辨认一条看不见的路。偶尔有鸟从寺顶掠过，影子滑在墙上，几乎没有声音。

午后，整个山谷安静下来，只剩钟声和呼吸的节奏。光在这一刻最亮，却也是最脆弱的。它让每一片瓦都像在呼吸，让建筑看起来不像人造的，而像自然自己长出来的形状。

In Tibet, the wind is not something that passes—it stays, suspended in the air as if the mountains themselves are breathing. In the early morning, the eaves hold the night's chill; sunlight has yet to settle when the monks begin sweeping the courtyards.

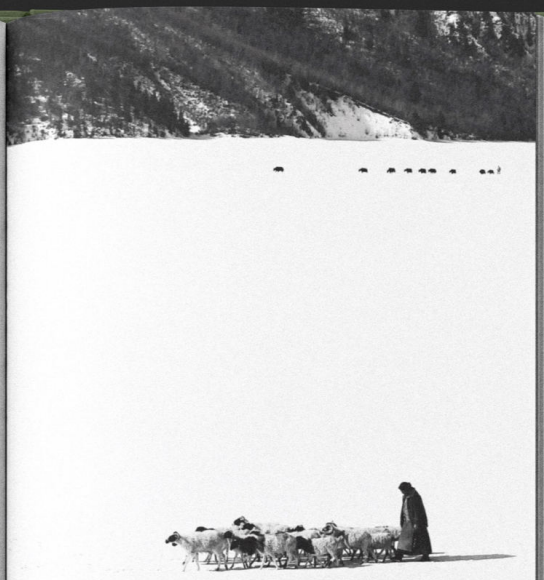

Dust gathers on the edge of each tile, rising in thin clouds whenever the light touches it. The roofs are not tall, but they seem to reach the underside of the clouds. White walls flicker faintly with yellow when the sun moves across them, and the wooden beams hum softly under the wind's weight. Walking among these rooftops feels like moving through time rather than space. The wind arrives from distant passes carrying the scent of snow, then shifts direction at the corners of buildings as if searching for an invisible path.

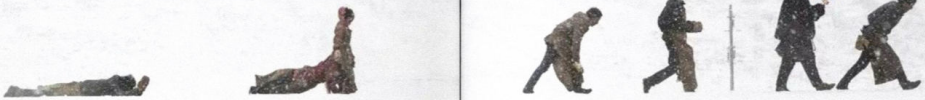

By afternoon the valley quiets—only the sound of a bell remains, mixed with the rhythm of breathing. Light is at its brightest then, yet also its most fragile. It makes every tile appear alive, the architecture less built than grown from the mountain itself.

雪落得很慢，风却从山的背面一直吹过来。
脚下的路只剩下一条浅浅的痕，踩上去就会被雪重新盖住。
走到山口时，我遇见一个牧羊人，他靠在石堆上，羊散在远处的白雾里。我们都裹着厚衣，只能听见呼吸在空气里化开。
他抬头问我，寺庙是不是在前面。我说，应该还要再过一座山。
风从我们之间穿过，带走了话的尾音，像什么都没发生过。

牦牛身上那一圈暖色毛发看起来很蓬松。 靠近时会闻到一点草味。

The snow was falling slowly. The path had faded to a shallow trace, each step erased by wind. At the pass, I met a shepherd leaning against a pile of stones, his flock scattered somewhere in the white distance. We were both wrapped in heavy coats; only our breathing was audible. He looked up and asked if the temple was ahead. I said it should be, beyond the next mountain. The wind passed between us and carried away the end of my words.

那天的风特别轻，像是走在寺庙门口都会被它推回去一样。我在大昭寺外的台阶上停了一会儿，看着朝圣者沿着广场慢慢移动。金色屋檐上落下的光像细碎的尘，落在他们的背脊上，也落在地面长长的影子里。他们的手掌贴着粗布，手臂被磨得发红，每一次俯身都稳、慢，却带着一种完全不同于城市节奏的力量。一个中年男人在我旁边停下，把手套脱下来，拍了拍袖子。他看上去比实际年龄老一些，但眼睛亮得不可思议。

“你从哪里来？”我问。

他笑了一下，喘着气说：

“从那边的山后……再过去一点。”

他说得轻，让人分不清这是谦虚还是一种习惯的节奏。

“一路都这样拜过来？”

他点点头，又笑了：

“慢一点也没关系嘛。这样走，心会亮一点。”

我愣了一下，不知道该怎么接话。寺庙的钟声从殿里传出来，混着香味和远处的风，让周围一下子安静下来。屋檐下的阴影像一条缓慢伸展的线，他低头整理垫子，把灰尘轻轻抖掉，动作细得像在照顾一件极重要的东西。

我忍不住问：

“那你现在累不累？”

他想了想，抬头看我：

“累啊。”

说这句话的时候，他笑得很真：

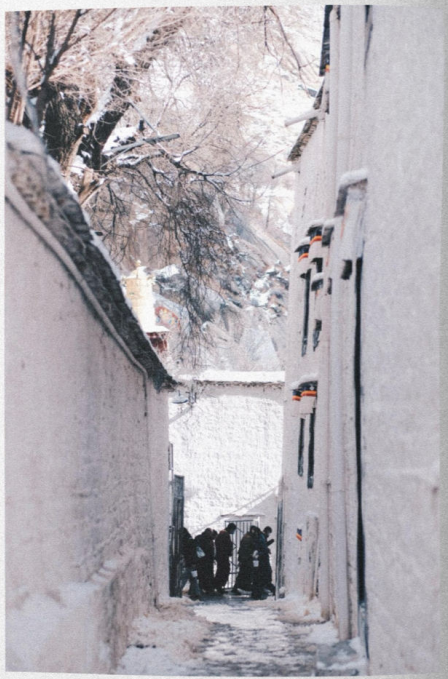

“可是心里的路，比脚下的路更长啊。”

我看着他继续向前，手掌贴在木板上，身体伏下，再站起，像一条极长的呼吸线。他的背影慢慢融进光里，阳光从金色屋脊反射下来，落在他每一次起身的那一瞬，亮得让我觉得自己也被照到了一点。

我站在远处看他们，是在看一种信仰；
但他们从远处走来，是在找一种方向。
而屋顶在高处亮着，让两者之间的距离显得更加诚实。
那一点点被光照出的谦卑，就是高原最真实的风景。

From a distance, I was watching devotion; but for those who journeyed from afar, they were walking toward direction.
The difference between the two was the slight humility the distance carved out—a humility as real as the wind on this high ground, and as honest as the roof shining above us.

The wind that day was so light it felt like it might push you back at the temple gate. I stopped on the steps outside Jokhang, watching pilgrims move slowly across the square. Light drifted down from the golden eaves, catching on their backs as they rose and bowed again. Their palms were wrapped in rough cloth, their arms rubbed raw, yet each prostration was steady—a rhythm the city would never understand.

A middle-aged man paused beside me, pulled off his gloves, and brushed the dust from his sleeves. He looked older than he was, but his eyes were impossibly clear in the thin highland air.

"Where did you come from?" I asked.
He smiled, catching his breath.
"From behind those mountains… a little farther beyond."
He said it so lightly I couldn't tell whether it was modesty or simply the pace of his voice.
"You've been prostrating the whole way?"
He nodded, and the smile returned.
"Going slow is fine. On a road like this, the heart gets brighter."

I hesitated, unsure what to say. The temple bell sounded from deep inside the hall, carrying incense and a distant breath of wind. The world quieted in a way I had only experienced on the plateau. The man bent down to straighten his pad, shaking the dust from it with a precision that felt almost tender, as if he were tending to something sacred.

I couldn't help asking,
"Are you tired?"
He thought for a moment, then lifted his gaze to me.
"Of course."
But he smiled—genuinely, openly—before adding,
"But the road inside is always longer than the one under your feet."

I watched him move on, palms pressing to the wooden board, body lowering, rising again—his silhouette stretching and gathering like a long line of breath. Sunlight reflected off the gilded roof ridge above him, catching the exact moment he rose each time, bright enough that I felt a trace of that light fall on me too.

从大雪的山脉一路往拉萨走，城市的红色慢慢从白里显出来。那红色安静而笃定，像在寒风里守着一盏不灭的灯。寺庙的金顶在阳光下亮得柔和，法轮、宝瓶、卧鹿都在屋脊边排开，让人一眼就知道信仰在这里从屋顶开始。

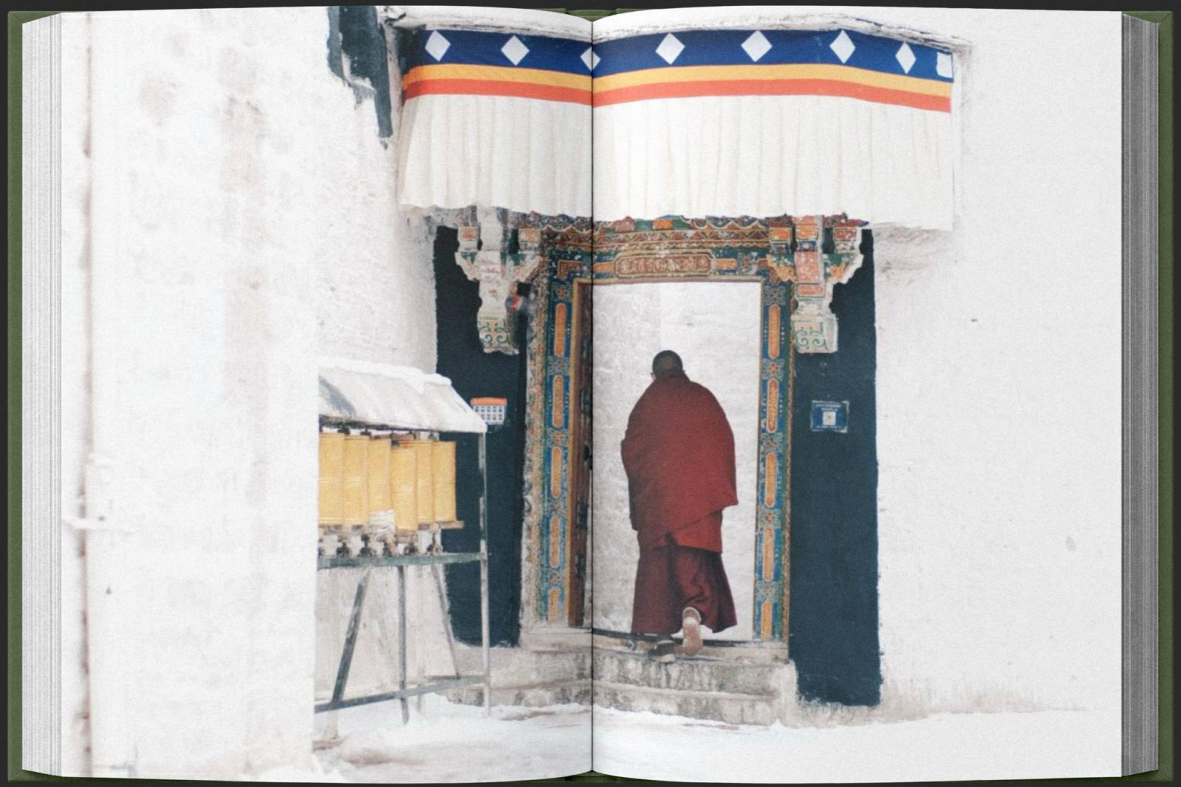

石木混合的结构贴着山势站得很稳，厚墙、深檐、金瓦都有它们的理由——抗寒、礼仪、象征，在冬天的雪光里显得格外清楚。走进寺院抬头看去，金顶离天空近得不可思议，像把人和天之间的距离轻轻折了一次。

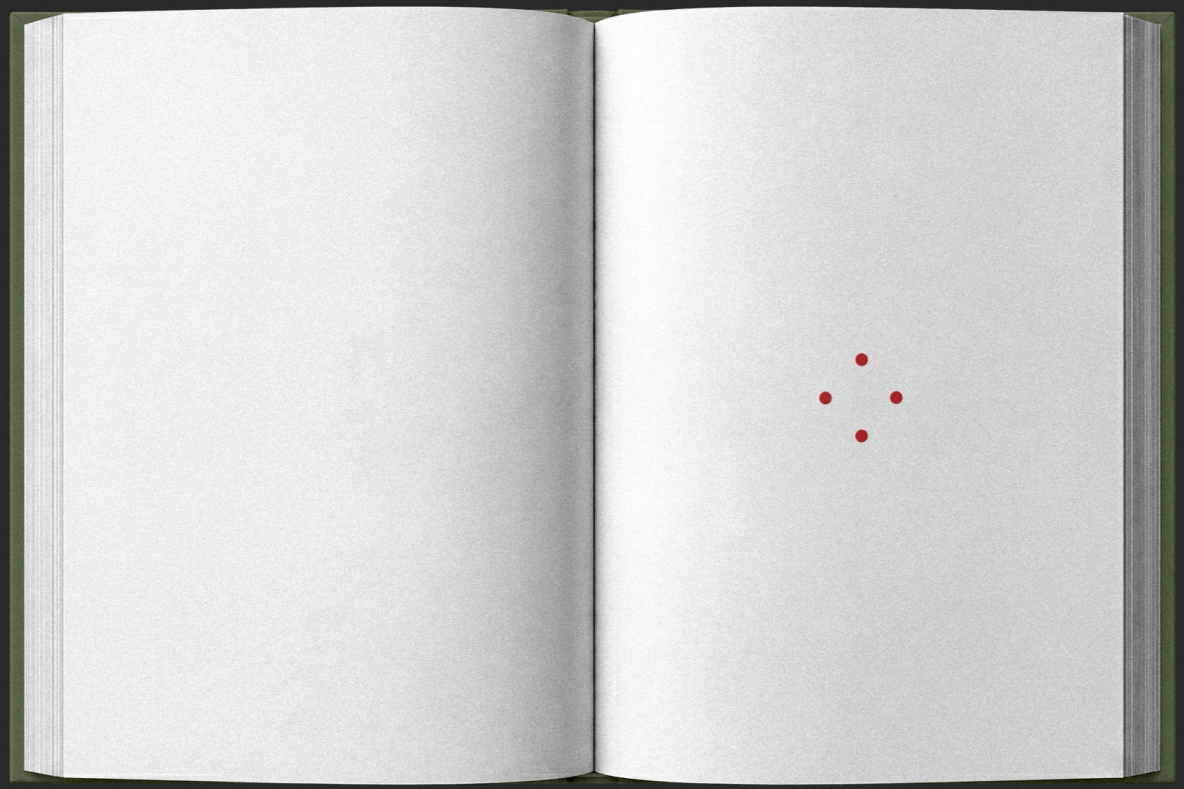

那一刻，我只觉得屋顶比风还坚定。

Descending from the snow-covered mountains into Lhasa, the city's red rose through the white—quiet, steady, like a small flame in the cold. The temples' golden roofs caught the winter sun, their wheels, vases, and deer along the ridges reminding me that belief here begins at the roofline. The stone-and-timber buildings stood firm against the slope, their deep eaves and gilded tiles shaped by both ritual and need.

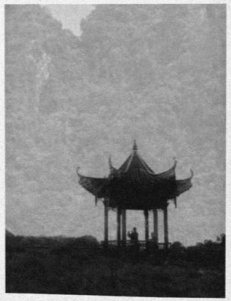

In the courtyard, the golden roof felt unusually close to the sky, as if the distance between earth and air had folded for a moment. In that stillness, the roof held more strength than the wind.

冬季的木栅有一点潮气，手放上去是凉的。
风从海面吹过来，带着一点水味。
坐了一会儿，觉得时间好像慢下来一点，不急着往前走了。雨停了，石板路湿得发亮。
树叶滴水，声音一点也不吵。南方的雨好像永远不急， 每次都慢慢落下来。 我闻到一点溪流的木头味。 像旧茶罐打开的那一瞬间。

在南方的水边走久了，我发现水上的雾气也像一种屋顶。
清早的时候，雾贴在河面上，压得很低，
让整条河像在屋檐下面小心呼吸。我站在桥上往下看， 水和雾混在一起，
分不清哪一层是水，哪一层是空气，
只觉得世界被盖住了一层又一层的柔软。

走进巷子的时候，屋顶忽然变得很矮，矮到让我以为只要抬高一点手
就能摸到瓦片。木栅在头顶压出一道浅浅的影子，我每走
几步就会抬头看一下，怕错过什么很好看的画面。

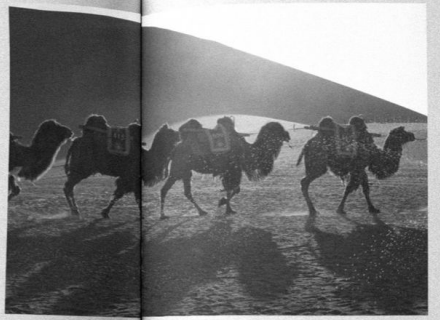

南方的小巷总是这样，看起来普
通，可光从屋檐缝里落下来时，那 一点亮就够我停很久。

雾、瓦片、影子　　小巷 它们叠在一起的时候， 我觉得自己像走进了一个被 轻轻折叠过的世界。

在西北这片路上，我开始慢慢觉得自己变得自由了。 车子在许多路上颠来颠去，
我被颠得有点恍神，可越往前走，心却越轻。
窗外一会儿是戈壁的干风，一会儿是祁连方向的雪光，景色变得太快，我什么都来不及定义， 只能看着它们从身边滑过去。

在藏区的路上，
我们停在一个小村子里买水。店里的老人不会普通话， 我也听不懂他的话，

但他笑得很真，递水的时候手还在颤。

继续往前开时，远处有牦牛慢慢走过，

空气里有种很“原始”的味道，不是指落后，而是一种没被割焊的真实感。
风吹在脸上很硬，可我反而觉得舒服

车继续颠着，我靠在窗边，让自己跟着路的节奏晃来晃去。

图片致谢　　Image Credits

本书所使用的所有视觉素材均参考自小红书平台公开发布的内容。 在此向各位创作者表达诚挚的感谢，
正因你们愿意分享影像，学习者与研究者才得以从中获得启发。

All visual materials used in this book reference publicly available posts on Red Note.
To the original creators, thank you for making these images accessible to learners and researchers.

图片来源创作者　（按出现顺序排列）
Creators　(listed in order of appearance)

@ 松林之间 2025/09
@ Ian饭多多 2022/07
@ 清醒周 2025/10
@ 风吸 2025/04
@ andy_cqs 2024/10
@ Viva La Vida 2025/11

@ 台下 2025/01
@ Yang 2023/06
@ 北海北 2025/03
@ 权老师手机摄影 2025/11
@ 最性民氧圈 2025/05

@ 为之奈何 2025/10
@ 六十岁的荷娃 2024/09
@ 劉江麟 PHOTO 2023/12
@ 竹间浑人 2025/06
@ 花甲咱嘎 2025/08
@ 哈士君 2025/01
@ 薄偉CHENWEI 2025/10
@ 广藏哪嘛 2024/09

@ Hippomarinae 2025/05
@ Louis Lee 2022/02
@ 阿仁波齐 2017/06
@ HIMAURA 喜雀 2025/06
@ 冬月野_PaNor 2024/01
@ 塔克尼玛 2024/01

@ 180斤的摄影师 2024/09
@ 花甲咱嘎 2023/11
@ Varvara Shtern 2025/05
@ 台下 2025/01
@ Ziyinnnnnn的有限表达 2025/05
@ 燕西Yancy 2025/02
@ 饿哈娘 2024/10
@ 河Rivers 2024/11

@ Osuansuan 2025/06
@ 青 2024/08
@ Bacon_s 2025/04
@ 老去的性 2024/10
@ 男琴 2024/11

整理于
南与北之间 · 天与地之间
2025

Compiled between South and North · Land and Sky
2025

每一种房屋的形状， 都来自一只看不见的手，
在风、在地、
在时间里慢慢塑成。

承脊之手

「造屋工艺小记」

Makers of Heaven

On the Making of Roofs

屋顶的诞生，从来不是从图纸开始的，而是从一双双手的技艺中缓慢出现。
泥被反复按压，直到能承受火；木材在风里晾干，与空气达成某种默契；榫卯在力的牵引下扣入结构，成为能够支撑季节与重量的骨骼。人们看见的是瓦与梁，但真正使屋脊升起的，是那些藏在内部的判断与经验。
在漫长的年代里，建屋的人很少留下名字，他们把心力留在瓦下，把时间嵌进梁间。今日所见的每一条屋脊，都是由无数无名之手一点点托起，使光得以落在瓦上，使人能在屋檐下停留、生活、躲雨、抬头。造屋并不仅是提供庇护，而是为天地立下一条秩序，让重量、风、光都找到自己的方向。而最接近这条秩序的，永远是那些造屋之人。

A roof never begins with a drawing, but with the memory of hands—clay shaped into tiles, timber guided into beams, joinery finding its balance. Invisible structures quietly passed from one generation to the next, lifting each ridge and catching each fall of light. To build a roof is not to create shelter, but to place a line between earth and sky—and those who build it stand closest to that line.

天沟

寺庙屋顶两侧的排水沟名称中保留“天”字，象征雨水的来处与去向皆受“天意”约束。

Heaven Gully

A drainage channel whose name preserves the idea that rain originates—and returns—under heaven's will.

檐之形

Shape of the Roofs

在传统观念中，屋顶不仅承担着物理意义上的遮蔽，更肩负着人与天之间的过渡功能。雨是这层关系中最直接、也是最鲜明的媒介。

In traditional architecture, a roof is more than a shelter; it is a threshold between earth and sky. Rain becomes the most immediate expression of this relationship.

脊兽

脊子前脊上的小像，多以甜都、守护为意，象征屋顶在风雨中获得精神保护。

Ridge Guardians

Small figurines placed along temple ridges, believed to protect the roof through storms and unseen forces.

斗拱

斗拱承接屋檐之重，以层叠木臂托起天宇，古人言其“承天以护人”，力学亦是哲思。

Dougong

The interlocking brackets that lift the eaves and steady the roof; once seen as the wooden arms that upheld heaven and protected those below.

无论是寺庙、祠堂，还是民居，屋脊的高度与曲线都暗含某种对“天意”的回应：屋顶以倾斜的姿态迎接雨水，又以温和的弧度将其送回大地。对古人而言，雨从天而来，是一种恩赐、考验，也是与神明沟通的方式；而屋顶的结构，就是这种沟通被固定在材料中的形状。

Whether on temples, ancestral halls, or ordinary homes, the pitch and curvature of a roof carry a quiet acknowledgement of the heavens: the roof receives the rain with its slope, then returns it gently to the ground. In older belief systems, rain was a blessing, a test, and a form of dialogue with the divine. The structure of the roof is simply that dialogue made permanent within material.

顺水瓦

特制瓦垄，使雨水按照特定路径滑落，减少冲刷，维持屋面仪式性的完整。

Rain-Guide Tiles

Special tiles designed to direct water along intended paths, protecting the ritual integrity of the roof surface.

藻井

藻井层层内收，使视线自然上引，回心和"屋有天气"，被视为供奉主魂之口。

Caisson Ceiling

The recessed ceiling that draws the eye upward through its layered geometry; its central hollow long regarded as an inner sky where prayers could ascend.

瓦与雨相遇时发出的细碎声响，被视为安稳的象征：雨顺着瓦沟滑落，则像是一种默默进行的仪式——屋顶既不抗拒，也不强求，而是在秩序与顺势之间寻找自己的位置。寺庙的屋面往往坡度更陡，让雨迅速退离，以保持圣域的洁净；民宅的坡度更缓，仿佛让雨多在屋脊上停留片刻，让日常生活获得某种短暂的祝福。

The sound of rain striking tiles was once heard as a sign of stability. Water sliding down a gully line resembled a small, continuous ritual—the roof refusing neither weight nor weather, but finding balance between order and surrender. Temple roofs are built steeper, allowing rain to fall quickly and keep the sacred ground pure; domestic roofs are gentler, letting the rain linger a little, as if granting the household a brief moment of quiet fortune.

滴水

檐口下的细小弧线，用以引水离墙。古人视“滴水讲断”象征内之福未容。

Drip Edge

The subtle curve beneath the eaves that guides water away from the walls; a clear drip was once considered a sign of continued household fortune.

风铃

檐角悬铃，随风自鸣，声清而短，被视作示风、辟急，亦是菩替与天相答的微响。

Wind Bell

The small bell hung at the eave, sounding when touched by wind; its brief ring believed to clear the mind and let the roof speak back to the sky.

雨在屋顶上留下的痕迹——暗色的瓦垄、被冲刷出的细线、檐下偶尔滴落的水珠——都被视为时间与信仰共同写下的语言。每一次降雨都是结构的考验，也是精神的更新，而屋顶正是在这样的循环中完成其宗教性的意义：保护，不仅来自于遮蔽，更来自于让天与地保持连贯。

The traces left by rain—darkened tiles, washed lines along the slopes, droplets forming at the eaves—are read as a language written jointly by time and faith. Each rainfall tests the structure and renews the spirit. The roof's religious role emerges in this cycle: protection not through resistance, but through maintaining continuity between heaven and earth.

